Alas, the times have changed. A day came when the authorities suddenly became austers and refused admittance to the garden to the ladies of questionable character. The gardens lost their attraction and were no longer crowded to the students in their hours of leisure. Then came the rebellion, when the Vandals burned the suburbs, devastated the palace, overthrew the gardens and massacred or carried off the population, and after them came the Imperial army who in their victory did what they could with the materials left them to imitate the work of their predecessors. ally visit these haunts of past delights. The gardens of China are as childish as the people who invented them. The general appearance is pleasing, and one is astonished to see how much can be not into such a small snace. One supposes at first sight the garden to be much larger than it really is, thanks to the winding paths and serpentine galleries which one is forced to follow. The first garden which we visited was the Chon Cheng Yuan, the Garden of the Easy Administration. It is situated a short distance from the point where one disembarked. and is entered from the road alongside the canal which traverses the city from east to west. It is one of the largest and best cared for. At the entrance one has to pay 12 cash, which charge is made to assist in keeping the graden in order

On each side are statues of hideous appearance, painted in bright colours, which seem to serre as her guard of honour. In front of the altar were three persous burning incense, and behind, like the seller of candles in some churches, was to be seen the vendor of perfume, candles, and small sticks of incense. A quarter of an hour's walk brings us the North. This is one of the most beautiful Pagodas of China. It has nine stories, and strange to say is almost perfect. It seems to have been respected alike by the rebels and the Imperialists, who usually made short work of all monuments. By way of contrast the large temple and the monastery suffered severely in the siege of 1863 and remain at present as they were then left. For a few cash an old priest broken down by age and the austerities of his order opened for us the door of the Pagoda and we entered accompanied by several provincials who wished to have a look at Sooshow from a height. as our people like to view Paris from the towers of Notre Dame or the column of the Place Ven-The stair has two hundred and eighteen
